Sonja,

Today is Giving Tuesday and we at Massachusetts Interfaith Worker Justice are so very grateful for your continued support of low-wage workers in Massachusetts. This year the working class, particularly immigrants, people of color, and others belonging to minority identity groups, have been the targets of distressingly xenophobic messaging, devastating acts of violence, and harsh policies that strip away hard-fought worker protections.

How has Mass. Interfaith Worker Justice responded? Through bolder, more creative, and more productive action. We underlined a moral narrative and amplified the voices of working people when we...

- Brought workers to nearly a dozen congregations throughout greater Boston through our Labor in the Pulpits/on the Bima/in the Minbar program, including striking Local 26 hotel workers, immigrants, security officers, airport workers, and trans workers.

- Gathered 350 signatures from clergy, congregations and people of conscience for a petition to protect our immigrant neighbors and delivered this petition to our US Senators, condemning the administration's move to cancel TPS (Temporary Protected Status) for hundreds of thousands of hard-working immigrants.

- Organized a faith and labor delegation to march alongside Unite Here Local 26 Marriott hotel workers as they fought for and won a contract that will insure them a livable wage, secure hours, good benefits and parental leave.

- Knocked on doors, made calls, collected postcards, chanted at rallies, and hosted educational events in support of nurses and trans folk fighting for ballot measures on the Nov 6th election.

- Held interfaith prayer circles in Logan Airport for organizing airport workers with SEIU 32BJ, showed up for security officers in their fight for a decent contract, and rallied with faculty and graduate students organizing with SEIU Local 509.

These are only some examples of the ways we have continued giving a voice to workers, immigrants, and those who count on small yet impactful non-profits like us to defend their rights and support their fights. Your support on Giving Tuesday insures that we can continue this work. Fuel the movement, make a donation today. We can't do it without you.

Thank you for your faithful support.

In faith and solidarity,
